Modeling Agency Scams

How the scam works
Modeling agencies place ads to encourage potential models to interview with the agency; many of the ads state “no fee.” Or you may be recruited by a talent scout in the mall.

Get everything in writing!

When you show up for a follow-up appointment, you find yourself in an office with other hopefuls. Once you finally get your turn, you find out that what you thought was a job interview with a modeling or talent agency is really a high-pressure sales pitch for modeling or acting classes, screen tests or photo shoots that can range in price from several hundred to several thousand dollars.

In the end, most of these would-be models receive no job assistance from the agencies, no job leads, and no modeling employment. Sometimes the potential models do not even receive the photographs they pay for. The companies simply pack up and leave town.

How to spot the scam

- “No fee.” If a modeling agency advertises that there is no fee for its services, you should be wary if you are asked to pay. Most legitimate agencies make money only by taking a commission from their models’ work.

- “Earn high salaries.” Typically only experienced, top models can expect to receive large salaries.

- “Work full or part time.” Modeling hours can be uneven and sporadic. You may not have the flexibility to choose your own hours.

- “Act now or risk losing out.” You need time to check out a company before you give them any money or personal information. If an offer is good today, it should be good tomorrow.

- They guarantee a refund. They say your deposit is refundable. Your deposit may be refundable only if you meet strict refund conditions. Or, you might be told talent experts will evaluate your chances of success and refund anyone not selected. What they do not tell you is the program takes virtually everyone.

- They only accept payment in cash or money order. It is a sure sign they are more interested in your money than your career!

- “Real people types should apply.” Some ads encourage people of all shapes, sizes, and ages to apply for commercial modeling work that involves the sale of a product. Remember, modeling opportunities are limited even in large cities. Opportunities do exist for “real people” models, but they are rare.

- They charge you money to take their classes, before you are eligible for modeling work. A legitimate modeling agency may provide instruction on applying makeup or walking, but most do not charge you for classes. An exception to this is when a modeling agency also serves as a modeling school. A modeling school does charge for classes, but that is a separate function from finding you work as a model.

- They conduct an unprofessional photo shoot. Once a modeling agency agrees to represent you, you will need photographs for your portfolio. You should look different in all your photographs by wearing a variety of cosmetics, clothes, and hairstyles. You may want to shop around for a photographer that best suits your portfolio needs.

- They require a particular photographer. If the modeling agency requires you to work with a particular photographer, chances are the photographer is working with the modeling agency, and they are splitting the fee. A legitimate modeling agency may recommend that you work with a certain photographer, but be skeptical if they are insistent.

Could your child be a star?
Fake talent scouts love to make you think your baby or child is model material and will gladly help you set up a photo shoot or classes to help you get modeling or acting jobs for your tyke. What they do not tell you is that the market for child models and actors is very small. And because a child’s looks change quickly, legitimate agents, advertising agencies, casting directors, and producers generally ask for casual snapshots, not professional photos.

What about the casting calls you hear about on the radio looking for the next child star? While they may be real in that one or two kids in the country are “discovered,” the agencies holding the calls often use them as a way to get parents to enroll their kids in expensive acting classes.

How to protect yourself
The best protection against losing money to a phony modeling agency is to take precautions. The following list may help you reduce your chances of losing money.

- Realistically assess your chances for being a model. Were you chosen by the agency because they believe you can make money for them – or just because you can afford to pay money to them?

  - Ask for the names, addresses, and phone numbers of models who currently work through the agency and clients who have used its models. Contact the models and clients to verify the information. If you cannot verify the agency’s credentials and they are asking for money in advance, you are better off saying no.

  - Check the agency’s reputation online. Try searching for the company’s name with words like “scam,” “rip-off,” or “complaint.”

  - Contact the Bureau of Consumer Protection to find out if other complaints have been filed against the agency. You can also check their reputation with the Better Business Bureau.

  - Check out all claims made in agency advertisements, sales presentations, and literature.

  - Be suspicious of agencies that require models to pay fees, including fees for agency books, by cash or money order only. This is a strong signal that the agency is interested in taking your money, not in representing you as a model.

  - Get everything in writing! Keep copies of all important papers, such as your contract and agency literature. Be sure to get all verbal promises in writing. You may need these if you have a dispute with the agency.

Where to go for help
If you have paid money to a modeling agency, and believe they are involved in a scam, first contact the company and request a refund. If you are not satisfied, file a complaint with the Bureau of Consumer Protection.
